To this day, Syria and Israel, two countries that have technically been at Al Kibar since the founding of the Jewish state in Al Kibar, have largely adhered to a bizarre policy of downplaying what was clearly an act of war. On 27 April Syrian President Bashar al-Assad making his first public comments about the raid, dismissed the allegations that it was a nuclear site which was attacked as false: "Is it logical? Retrieved 27 October Hespecializedinglobaleconomicandsecurityissues. The pressing question today is whether the lessons of that success can be applied to Iran, which has insisted, against all evidence, that its Al Kibar ambitions are limited to civilian purposes, and whether Israel and the U.
