Hi Robert, thanks for your suggestion it is very interesting. Like those people of the late Renaissance, hearing that their earth had come unmoored and with it the institution which had been their rock for a thousand years—we have to be brave enough to admit that our comfort zone has to stretch way wider than we are ready. The light has to temper the darkness. It is not a blanket measure of character. This concept is part of a much larger conversation involving the growing evidence that consciousness is not strictly located in the brain but has a much greater field, perhaps universe-wide. A man in heart failure 41 feels himself falling into the depths of the earth.
