romantic acquaintance which, at this very time, while on a visit to Leibgeber, he forms with a young lady of great beauty and high mental attainments, the intimate friend of his friend, Siebenkäs (German Edition) by name, adds a new interest to his life and to the story; though she is no further concerned in the present affair than that, being penniless and dependent on a rich relation, who wants to marry her to a worthless character, she consents, in ignorance, of course, of the entire scheme, to accept a pension secured for her in a life-insurance office, upon the decease of her admirer; a "fraud," as we should call it in plain English, upon the office aforesaid, for which, as well as for the purchase of a widow's pension for Lenette, Leibgeber furnishes the funds; the dishonesty of the transaction being somewhat palliated by an intention to indemnify the office out of the profits of the bailiwick.
