Interpersonal, Intergroup, and Cultural Context. Critical conditions and limitations Models of assimilative influence are prone to generate consensus, in particular when they assume opinions with a continuous scale.

In particular, the averaging assumption implies that opinions will never move. Models with repulsive influence When individuals are too dissimilar in some models on a specific opinion dimension they can also influence each other towards increasing mutual opinion differences repulsive influence. Other authors have moved towards integrating and comparing continuous and nominal models of similarity-biased social influence. WOOD, W.
