The pain is in the non-coincidence of language and self, the never fully present

In all these rotten shops, in all this broken furniture and wrinkled ties and baseball trophies and coffee pots I have never seen a post-war Philco with the automatic eye nor heard Ravel's "Bolero" the way I did in in that tiny living room Dancing with Words: Poetry: Poetry Beechwood Boulevard, nor danced as I did then, my knives all flashing, my hair all streaming, my mother red with laughter, my father cupping his left hand under his armpit, doing the dance of old Ukraine, the sound of his skin half drum, half fart, the world at last a meadow, the three of us Dancing with Words: Poetry: Poetry and singing, the three of us screaming and falling, as if we were dying, as if we could never stop—in — in Pittsburgh, beautiful filthy Pittsburgh, home of the evil Mellons, 5, miles away from the other dancing—in Poland and Germany— oh God of mercy, oh wild God. Two minds, and one single thought, I love you, I adore you I am worshiping you Sing and dance with me, my Lancelott, you're my Knight Lover of life, my true love. It is said that the heart of any culture lives in its poetry. If you're you, don't try to dance like him or. My heels click and stomp about, your feet intact, without a doubt, but something cracks, between us both, a shattered, silent, bond-broken oath.
